Health Educator

Not just work— work that matters.

"I became a health educator because I believe knowledge is power. In public health, I get to share information that helps people live longer, healthier lives. Whether I'm teaching a class, creating resources, or working one-on-one with community members, I know that what I do today can prevent illness tomorrow. It's rewarding to help people make informed choices—and to see entire communities benefit."

Health educators use the power of information to improve the well-being of individuals, families, and communities. They design and deliver programs that promote healthy behaviors, prevent disease, and support people in making informed decisions about their health. Whether it's leading workshops, creating educational campaigns, or building partnerships, health educators play a vital role in advancing public health and promoting health equity. Jobs in this field may have minimum education or licensure requirements set by Civil Service. For details on specific qualifications and current openings, visit your county's personnel or civil service webpage.

If you're ready for a career that offers meaningful impact, great benefits, and flexibility, your county health department is looking for dedicated professionals like you.
