Emergency Preparedness Coordinator

Not just work—work that matters.

"As the Public Health Emergency Preparedness Coordinator at the local level, my priority is ensuring our community is ready to respond to any emergency, whether it's a severe weather event, infectious disease outbreak, or other public health threat. Preparedness is a shared responsibility. When we build strong partnerships, plan ahead, and stay informed, we build a stronger, more resilient community together. My role is to help our residents stay ready, informed, and protected before, during, and after any public health emergency."

Public Health Emergency Preparedness helps to strengthen local public health departments' capabilities to respond to public health threats. The Public Health Emergency Preparedness Coordinator works to improve and address community preparedness, response, and recovery during emergencies, including natural and man-made disasters and disease outbreaks. They coordinate emergency response efforts, communicate important health information, help deliver medical supplies and care, monitor health trends, support emergency workers, and organize volunteers.

Jobs in this field may have minimum education or licensure requirements set by Civil Service. For details on specific qualifications and current openings, visit your county's personnel or civil service webpage.
